So to be honest, there really was no one that could come close to playing all the roles. I was very impressed by the overall quality of the film as of 2015. The production values of each scene are impressive to say the least and were impressive during filming (it takes quite a while before the camera pans up to show the actor sitting on the stage with blood on his face). I know that the film is supposed to be a little more intense than the series (the film feels a tad too melodramatic and repetitive), as it contains many different types of fights and scenes. There are three main scenes from which the film is based. One of them shows Miyazaki fighting himself, where we see his full face, blood dripping from his mouth, nose and eyes. The scene begins with him jumping off of a cliff and then falling to the floor on all fours, the blood soaking in the air.. However, I think it better suited this film to Miyazaki's performance, which has already been compared to a certain Katsuhiro Otomo films. Miyazaki is shown fighting his father in a lot of other Japanese works; in The Good, The Bad, and The Ugly, for instance. However, Miyazaki wasn't forced to take his usual dramatic approach, and actually goes to great lengths of creating a mood with a film which is very different from the typical Japanese film.
